Ah, I understand: William = idiot

Now please, go away. You don't have any technical knowledge at all, and unless you're willing to learn, you'll just keep on spouting nonsense. I won't mind you, but please stop telling such nonsense to other people who don't know any better.

Wow. I have watched this thread for a while now. Impressive, really. One person can be so sure in himself, and so "secure" in his belief that HIS system is the most secure, and his advice should be followed. Yet, while going through the posts, I have yet to see any suggestions, or even helpful advice from ANY of your posts. At least the OP is asking for advice. He/she is doing so to aid in a proper decision. OP is showing critical thinking. I must say, just that alone is far more than you are showing us. I normally would steer clear of this, but I must admit, you do sound an awful lot like the poster "Mr. Arnold" who has since seen the ugly side of my killfile- a place where you will permanently reside. Where I work, we have an entire sub department like this. We refer to them as the "Trolls" or "Furry-teeths". We keep them locked in the server dungeon while we deal with the real work, and only let them out at night to check cables, and eat dust bunnies. They like to think that they are important being in the dungeon, and are there as the "Tier 3" support and security specialists because they are omnipotent, but the real reason we put them there is because the sight of them causes fear in small children and their body odour is enough to gag a maggot in a meat wagon. A bunch of people who have too much education and book smarts, coupled with a crippling case of small penis syndrome. They like to think they are the most secure department, but really... its because we cut their cables. I have no doubt in my mind that you possess a great deal of knowledge when it comes to security. However, I have to ask- can you apply it to the real world? And can you do what any person in the position of possessing such knowledge should (and most would) do? Help others? I have my doubts.
