Geez, you impress me ! Thanks.

Just to let you know, these are the IT dept tech machines having these problems...lol. Not our staff machines, whom we have made powerusers.

I am using my machine as the built in Admin, not logging onto a domain and not a member of any other group. So, there shouldn't be anything overriding or interfering with full admin rights, right? :)

Also, to get even deeper here (if this is too much for you I understand), my own machine which I am vigilant about when applying service packs, patches, virus def updates etc when they are available has acted strange in other ways as well. Such as my copy and paste disappearing. I read on another forum that this was a symptom of blaster, even though I never had reason to suspect I was infected, I had none of the typical blaster symptoms at all, but I applied the blaster patch anyway (even though I should have been protected since I do updates every couple of days and definitely had done one several times since the release of the patch)and ran the Symantec removal tool which did not find blaster.

Maybe I'll just do an fdisk and save myself grief.

Thanks Once Again
