

microsoft.public.windows.server.security: Re: block a user from deleting their temp internet files

Re: block a user from deleting their temp internet files

Source: <http://www.derkeiler.com/Newsgroups/microsoft.public.windows.server.security/2005-03/0463.html>

---

From: Mark Randall (markyr_at_REMOVETHISgoogle.ANDTHIScom)

Date: 03/29/05

Date: Tue, 29 Mar 2005 15:25:03 +0100

Hope you took away every MS office product, the command prompt and notepad as well, I once enumerated every file and folder on my entire school domain using MS office and VBA, thats the sorta thing you have to be careful of, its like putting visual studio on your computers, once you do kiss your security goodbye, the computer is now in the ownership of anyone who can log on and code.

Removing ones ability to view through explorer is pretty useless especially if you don't revoke traverse permissions.

Of course – moving the temp internet files folder to some bizzare location may help.,

– MR

"Steve Good (492720)" <Steve.good@colstrip.com> wrote:

- > Actually you could prevent them from accessing them with minimal ease.
- > What
- > we do in our school district is take away the "internet options" and the
- > ability to view the "C Drive" This eliminates the easy way for someone to
- > browse to the location or use Internet options to delete. Although these
- > are
- > "temp" files if the cache is large enough it can provide valuable evidence
- > if a user was to access something they should not. This has served
- > valuable
- > for us in the past. Via policy you could set permissions to give system
- > full
- > control but the user only read and write ability to those locations. I
- > would
- > assume that the system would still have access to overwrite files this
- > way.
- > Anyone defiantly could find ways around but for allot of users all you
- > have
- > to do is block the obvious to fix issues.
- >
- >

Re: block a user from deleting their temp internet files

microsoft.public.windows.server.security: Re: block a user from deleting their temp internet files

>

> Steve