Greetings --

As with all earlier Microsoft operating systems, it's necessary (to be in compliance with both the EULA and copyright laws, if not technically) to purchase one WinXP license for each computer on which it is installed. Further, WinXP differs from earlier versions of Windows in that Microsoft has finally added a copy protection/anti-theft mechanism, Product Activation, to prevent (or at least make more difficult) the sort of multiple installations you're describing.
