No. It is not a crisis of personality. It has been already noted that the majority of suicide bombers are from the educated middle class. What happens is they have recently learn how to be analytical and for the first time they also start to think about their role in the world (the first time they have ever had to think about things like employment, work and a long term future etc) and they see that many of the things they believed aren't true – in particular they see that life is not fair. This causes disillusionment with what is seen as the establishment. With the correct "grooming" they can become terrorists or suicide bombers.

Currently the approach has focused on destroying/suppressing the anti-establishment – but this approach brings even more people into contact with brutal side of governments. By itself it does not work.

It is not a crisis of personality but a crisis of conscience that make someone become vulnerable to extremist philosophy.
