organized a filtration system.

The feedback was not simply machine throughput rates, but also—via the central computer—a system 'through which anyone could consult anyone else'.

I used keyword monitoring to filter "information" from "noise" in Salomon's HUGE email traffic. What I did, of course, was small potatoes; what Stafford Beer did was a serious cybernetic attempt to control an entire nation's economy.

In order for him to do that, he needed to set

The nation's banks, factories and industrial companies.

It would have given Allende maximum control over the nation's industrial infrastructure, real-time monitoring of everything.

Everything had a computer monitoring it.

* McNamara's revolution built on an idea that was central to operations research and propounded by many nuclear strategists, that war was not methodologically distinguishable from economics. The process whereby you analyzed, managed, and controlled an economy was not essentially different from the way you managed a war, except that one was an economy of production and the other was an economy of force. The principal underlying both was the doctrine of efficiency: maximizing the benefits received from the efforts and expenditures—a cost benefit analysis.

Cyberneticians hope to use their capabilities for the betterment of the human race, of which they are a part.

They are not naive when it comes to the government and politics, either.
