William S. Sessions, questioned by the Senate Judiciary

- * Committee in March 1986, acknowledged that he once told one of his
- * assistants that he thought several Ku Klux Klan members accused of
- * lynching a black man "were OK until I learned they smoked pot".

This is a historically consistent view espoused by Government officials:

- # "60 Years of Reefer Madness", High Times Magazine, July 1997
- #
- # 1937: Harry Anslinger, head of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, read into
- # official testimony (without objection) before Congress, stories of
- # "coloreds" with big lips seducing white women with jazz and marijuana,
- # claiming that 50% of all violent crime by blacks and Latino immigrants
- # has been traced directly to marijuana.

- * "Phantom Numbers Haunt the War on Drugs"
- * By Christopher S. Wren, The New York Times, April 20, 1997
- *
- * Politicians are said to use statistics the way drunks use lampposts: for
- * support rather than illumination. The aphorism seems more apt for the War
- * on Drugs, which abounds with statistical lampposts that shed little light
- * on the nation's preoccupation with illegal substances.
- *
- * When sensibly vague estimates based on the little that is known won't
- * suffice,
